Capt. Nash furnishes us the following details concerning the planting of the great oyster bed. Those acquainted with its precise locality will see that the bearings given by the Capt. would bring the line of his oyster strewing precise over where the great bed is now found Those familiar with oyster chronology walch would carry it back to the period of Capt. Nash's loss of his oysters. It is the theory of some also that the ovsthe bed. Nathan Roberts, who was then mate of the Minerva, and now a resident of Norwalk, has frequently mentioned cion that an oyster bed was planted at that time, and, we believe, the subject of trying the bottom in that locality, was often seriously discussed by himself. and friends. Our venerable friend abweek that he claimed the "koner" of planting this bed, and it is due to his unpretending nature to say that he simply desired to state an interesting fact, week; hoping that something useful grow out of it in regard to the already great and growing interest of oyster danting. He assuress us that if Divine Providence has thus unwittingly made him the instrument of so great a blessing to his fellow men, he claims no merit therefor. We append the statement in his own words:

"D. K. NASH, of the schooner Minervo, of Norwalk, being bound to Charlestown, Miss., about the latter part of October, 1838, the wind blowing heavy to the enstward,-having on deck about 30 bushels of scollop Oysters, mostly single, and apparently of large two years growth, intended for his own and his friend's winter use. Tacked ship in Huntington bay and standing to the north, a little to the westward of Eaton's Neck through the middle passage. While standing on the course above indicated, and fairly in the Sound, the schooner laid her gunwale well under water; when she righted so as to free herself of the water, it was discovered that very many of the oysters had washed overboard .-This was repeated, so that we had distributed on our track about half, or 15 and the water deep, the oysters thus distributed must have extended to considerable width, and the schooner pass- adopted. ing rapidly through the water, at conthe mate, made the remark at the time 'we have planted a bed of Oysters for somebody."

BUXING A NEW STOVE,-A good one is told of a newly married couple who started houskeeping a short time since, which we think, so long as we do not tell the names of the pasties, will hear "telling again." Among other articles of household furniture purchased by the new housekeepers, the most necessary of course was a new cooking stove. It's taken in by the stove dealer.

The purchaser was thereupon assured by the dealer that he would not only stand to his agreement to refund the price of the store in case it did not suit, but he would go further and give him one gratis in case it was in the condition represented by the former .men to examine the "provoking article," to which the purchaser readily assented, (how could be do otherwise, after the his eyes glistened with satisfaction at own great merits." the prospect of having a new stove to sell for old iron.
